

ABSTRACT

The semiconductor memory receives an external clock signal and has the memory cell array access operation controlled based on the clock signal. In the application of this semiconductor memory to a dynamic RAM, for example, a row address and column address are introduced in synchronism with the clock signal. The read, write and refresh operations are controlled based on the clock signal.